A U.S. district judge in California is conducting a hearing Monday to hear arguments about a proposed settlement that would end a five-year lawsuit against the NCAA and five power conferences.

If approved, it would allow colleges and universities to pay athletes. That's beyond the money student-athletes are already allowed to make from name, image and likeness.

US Department of Education offers guidelines on NIL

Birmingham sports attorney Rick Davis played for Bear Bryant at the University of Alabama and then went on to play in the NFL. He has paid attention to the huge changes college sports have gone through in recent years since players have been allowed to profit from their names, images and likenesses. He said, "It's changed the whole game. It's becoming more of a professional, you know, than it is going to school to play for the school and get your education."

The settlement that a U.S. district court judge will soon make a ruling on could mean even more changes. Referred to as the "House" settlement, it would allow colleges and universities to pay players directly. Davis wants it to include some restrictions as well that would keep players from making so many transfers. He said, "The restrictions that used to be in place are no longer in place. And that's what hopefully this will address that and make it to where you can't have a merry-go-round every year of players, or it's a revolving door for guys to come here for one year, and then they'll go somewhere else in the next year."

Tuberville, Manchin introduce bipartisan bill to regulate NIL

It's expected that this settlement will give the NCAA, along with the SEC, ACC, Big 10, Big 12 and Pac-12, more name, image and likeness oversight. But Davis doesn't think it will end the lawsuits. He added, "There'll be other lawsuits even once this settlement is done. There'll be people that they're not, they're not a part of it."

Springtime is here, which means more open windows, and more pollen coming into your home. An air purifier is one way that you could reduce spring allergens and create a healthier home for you and your loved ones.

According to the Asthma and Allergy Foundation of America, more than 100 million people in the United States experience various types of allergies each year.

Experts say keeping doors and windows closed while indoors and utilizing a vacuum to clean out dust are some of the ways to help. The installation of an air purifier is another thing you can do at your home to help alleviate allergies.

As it so happens, there are many air purifiers you could purchase right now for just under $100.

Here are some of the best air purifiers we found for under $100.

LEVOIT Air Purifier

This is one of the most top-rated air purifiers listed on Amazon right now. The air purifier can refresh the air in rooms as large as 183 square-feet and capture 99.97% of airborne contaminants.

It's also compatible with Amazon Alexa and Google Assistant, so you can use the air purifier without lifting a finger.

Boasting 37,000 customer ratings for a score of 4.7 stars out of five stars, one customer said the air purifier is “quiet and effective.”

“I've also noticed a huge improvement in my allergies since I started using this air purifier. I live in Texas, and I swear the outdoors is trying to kill me through my allergies,” the customer wrote. “I've definitely noticed an improvement in my symptoms.”

Clorox Air Purifier

This air purifier is ideal with medium-sized rooms and can clean a 1,000 square-foot room in an hour or clean a 225 square-foot room up to five times per hour thanks to the air purifier's 360 airflow.

Clorox recommends replacing the filter every six to 12 months in order to achieve optimal cleaning.

In addition, the air purifier has an auto mode that automatically adjusts the fan speed in response to changes in air quality detected by the sensor.

One customer boasted about how quiet the machine is.

"I let it run on the 8 hour setting overnight on fan level one and it was barely audible," the customer said. "It is louder with the higher fan speeds as expected, but it works."
